Subject: Lack of clarity regarding applicable vehicle types

Comment:

The education sector is unable to determine the full effect of the proposed ACF regulation because the language regarding the vehicle types included and excluded is unclear. It exempts "school buses" as defined in statute, but that statutory definition references both physical characteristics of vehicles and their uses. That statute seems to conflict with the regulation as to whether smaller buses and other vehicles used to transport students are included or excluded from ACF requirements.

All,

I have submitted comments and received no response. I have concluded that one cannot stop a religious movement with logic or patience. You all are applying force to a problem that needs to be cured with time and market forces, neither of which you are willing to consider even in the slightest!

Going "electric" is an environmental and infostructure disaster and waste of taxpayer dollars for a political movement.

It is like taking a gardener's lawn mower and making him use 8 or 10 batteries per day and throwing those batteries out every few months. You have sold yourselves on a program that makes no sense to anyone but your church members.

FYI

Subject: ACF Regulation Correction on "Useful Life" Definition
Comment:

The definition of "minimum useful life" defines when a vehicle must be eliminated from a fleet and is one of the most critical definitions in the ACF regulation. It is found in Article 3.4, Section 2015(b), under paragraphs (A) and (B).

Existing text is confusing and lacks clarity. Fortunately, there is a simple fix.

Replace this text given both paragraphs A and B: "...model year that the engine and emissions control system in a vehicle was first certified for use by CARB or United States Environmental Protection Agency (U.S.EPA)."

With this text: "...model year of the vehicle's engine, provided the original engine is still in the vehicle, with the model year as specified by the family number give on the engine's Emission Control Label."

The term "... first certified for use by CARB..." creates all sorts of confusion. For example, ARB approves virtually all engine emission certifications the year before an engine model year for obvious reasons. One could construe "first certified" to the year on CARB EO for a given engine family, which would make all engines one year older that the actual model year.

Then you have carryover certification where an emission certification can be used for subsequent model years where an engine and emission standard do not change. Does "first certified" mean the current engine family model year or the year that engine family was first certified? This again is really confusing and could also accelerate the rate at which trucks must be eliminated.

Fortunately, there is super simple solution. All engines are required to have a readable Emission Control Label on the engine that gives the engine's emission family, and the the first character of the family number specifies the model year of that engine.

The proposed corrected text replaces highly confusing "first certified" year with the engine model year as given by the engine's family number.

I confirmed that the engine family number is the basis for determining model year with ARB staff (email communication of 8/21/23 with Chris Franceschi, ARB).

Finally, more minor, the use of text "...certified for use by CARB or United States Environmental Protection Agency (U.S. EPA)" is unnecessary. Existing regulations prohibit the use of engines in vehicles that have not been certified by ARB/EPA. This text only serves to make the regulation longer.

Comment:

Our agency, which has a mission to protect public health, through integrated vector management in an environmental and economic manner, will have our mission execution threatened by the new regulation, as we understand it. While we want to be partners in the move to clean energy and zero emissions, our agency uses 4WD pickup trucks to get our technicians into mosquito habitat. The current EV technology does not support this and creates a hazard to our employees when outside the city in wetlands and other semi-wild areas. A modified purchase ratio of 4:1 combustion:zero emissions, would be supportable. Thank you for your consideration.
